senator from Delaware; his father was senator, and he will serve his life long as a senator unless lightning should strike him. He has two or three promising sons, the eldest of which regards his father's place as by his right. Mr. Bayard lives at a very pleasant place upon Highland terrace, in the same row where Justice Miller and Sanator Edmunds reside. He spends a majority of his time studying what he calls constitutional questions. He is an easy, charming talker, and like most men of his kind, is greater in the monologue than in conversation. You ask him a question and he half shuts his eyes and starts off, and may talk, perhaps, in a pointed, interesting way for half an hour before you will find an opportunity to ask him another question. The writer remembers calling at his house one night during the last days of the elec-toral commission. Mr. Bayard had just returned from a protracted evening session of the commission. It was nearly eleven o'clock when the writer arrived at the senator's house, and he found several other corres-

BAILWAY BECORD. RAILROAD KINGS. Who are they? Those whose coffers hold The wealth of bonds, and notes, and gold? Whose homes, magnificent and high. Are rare with all earth's luxury? Whose wives are clad in silk array? Whose daughters diamonds can display? The muse for them no proud song sings, For there are nobler railroad kings.

With breath of steam, and heart of fire,
That yet may light a funeral pyre,
The smoking steeds that bear them by
Wake thunderous echoes as they fly;
The whistling acresm, the langting bell,
Their nearness to our thresholds tell,
And while the jarring clampor rings,
Men may look forth on railroad kings,

What is Manua?

The planting of fraxinus trees in Italy yields a good return without any great trouble or cost incurred. At the age of eight years these trees are used to produce manua, for which purpose a horizontal incision is made in the bark about one fifth of the entre breadth. The manua is collected for many years, when the trees become exhausted, and are cut down, leaving only a single time.

Not those whose busy brains have laid. The pulsing arteries of trade,
Who, through the laberer's toiling hands,
Have linked the world in iron bands;
Not those who sit in splendid state,
Whom men call lordly, rich and great,
Not those atone to whom fame brings.
Her fawning meed, are railroad kings.

Through summer's heat and winter's show, Fearless they journey to and fro, Unknowing wast dire, bliter fate. Along their winding track may wait. A thousand times they cross the stream. That yet may cradic life's last dream; That yet may drown their gurgling cry Of dying woe and agony. O'er vallers cool and dim they dart;
They pierce the mountain's rock-ribbed heart
They know where brightest dew-drops wet
The blue eyes of the violet.
They know where first and fairest blows,
On velvet banks, the sweet wild rose;
They know, too, every bed of bloom
May prove a blood-dred couch of doom.

While others rest in quiet sleep,
What wrathful storms about them sweep!
What spectres haunt their midnight sky!
What wailing winds around them sigh!
As though the spirits of the air
Crowded in wailing everywhere,
Sounding upon Mollan strings
A requiem for our railroad kings. The treasures of the world they bear, And priceless things are in their care; Stern sentinels at dury's post, They toy with death and make no boast. They ask no meed of praise or fame, They strive to win no laureled name, But while they speed on lightning wings, We crown them as our "Italiroad Kings,"
